WORKERS WITH HIGH SOCIOEMOTIONAL SKILLS EARN MORE

Unlike traditional academic, cognitive, and technical skills, socioemotional skills—also known as soft skills, noncognitive skills, or behavioral skills—reflect the worker’s personality, attitude, and mindset.

The Skills Towards Employability and Productivity (STEP) assessment is a global initiative by the World Bank that strives to measure workforce skills in developing countries and, for the first time, to generate a set of internationally comparable data on socioemotional skills. The World Bank developed the STEP assessment to provide analysts and policy makers with quantifiable, granular information on socioemotional skills.

Socioemotional skills in STEP reflect the so-called big five personality traits—conscientiousness, openness to experience, agreeableness, extraversion, and emotional stability—as well as two addition behavior traits, grit and decision making.

These seven traits are expected to influence an individual’s ability to achieve goals (conscientiousness, openness to experience, and grit), work with others (agreeableness and extraversion), and manage emotions (emotional stability and decision making).

The report shows that greater socioemotional skills tend to correlate with higher earnings. Extraversion and openness to new experiences were the socioemotional skills most strongly correlated with increased earning. Service-sector workers with strong socioemotional skills command a wage premium of about 10 percent. However, socioemotional skills have no significant correlation with wages in the agricultural or manufacturing sectors.
